

Harry Potter & the Deathly Hallows by JK Rowling

Harry, Ron and Hermione have been searching for Horcruxes for months and have only found one. In this scene Ron finally snaps and confronts Harry about the 'wild goose chase' he believes he is leading them on.

Ron:

Problem? There is no problem. Not according to you, anyway. Alright, I'll spit it out. Don't expect me to skip up and down the tent because there is some other damn thing we've got to find. Just add it to the list of stuff you don't know. It's not like I'm having the time of my life here, you know, with my arm mangled and nothing to eat and freezing my backside off every night. I just hoped, you know, after we'd been running around for a few weeks, we'd have achieved something.

We thought you knew what you were doing! We thought Dumbledore had told you what to do, we thought you had a real plan! We've found, what, one Horcrux, and we're about as near to getting rid of it as we are to finding the rest of them, nowhere near in other words!

Don't lie! You said it too, you said you were disappointed, you said you'd thought he had a bit more to go on than this. Maybe I'll go home. Didn't you hear what they said about my sister? But you don't give a rat's fart, do you, it's only the forbidden Forest, Harry I've-faced -worse Potter doesn't care what happens to her in there.

I get it, you don't care! And what about the rest of my family? The Weasley's don't need another kid injured, did you hear that? Not bothered what it meant though? Oh, you're sure are you? Right then, well, I won't bother myself about them.

It's alright for you two, isn't it, with your parents safely out the way - mine could be dying!

(get bag and moves to exit)

Hermione? What are you doing? Are you staying or what? (Pause) I get it. You choose him.
